Article on Stress

- by Dr. Neetee Mehta

Stress is a many – faceted process that occurs in reaction to events or situations in our environment termed stressors. An interesting feature of stress is the wide range of physical and psychological reactions that different people have to the same event. Some may interpret an event as stressful, whereas others simply take it in stride. It is considered as a silent killer. You can cope up with stress by being task – oriented, being yourself, self – monitoring, facing reality about what you can achieve, having a constructive outlook and by being patient with yourself. Stress can be negative or positive. Positive stressors are for example : getting married or a job promotion. Negative stressor are endless like some long faced disease, environment of home as well as workplace, examination stress etc. In a stressful situation blood pressure rises, pulse races and a person starts to sweat. These general pattern of reactions are referred to as the Flight syndrome, which is a process controlled through the sympathetic nervous system.
